

Thank you all for coming and trying the experimental format.

Looking at the scores, many people might have been better off ignoring the option of going back and forth to the bonus control, and just done a normal loop around the area picking up controls. So in that way the bonus control worked, as it gave more route choice options, more things to think about and more sport. Of course it could be that lots of people lost time looking for the control that was on the wrong road junction, sorry about that.

The other aim of the bonus control was that I could use less controls and a smaller area so I would have time to put controls out after work. 5pm left work, 6.50pm all controls out. I could have reduced this by 20 minutes or so by organising the gripples the night before.

I could have just done the normal two groups of controls (90's/100's), but the bonus control makes a change. In a forest event it might work better with the rule that you must do at least 2 controls after the bonus, that would force the competitor to plan "butterflies". Or does it get too complicated?

Sean.
